

Adventurers! A year ago I was rebuffed by Red Mountain...

Red Mountain is actually the wide mountain on the right. On the left is another "red" mountain and I don't know its' name.

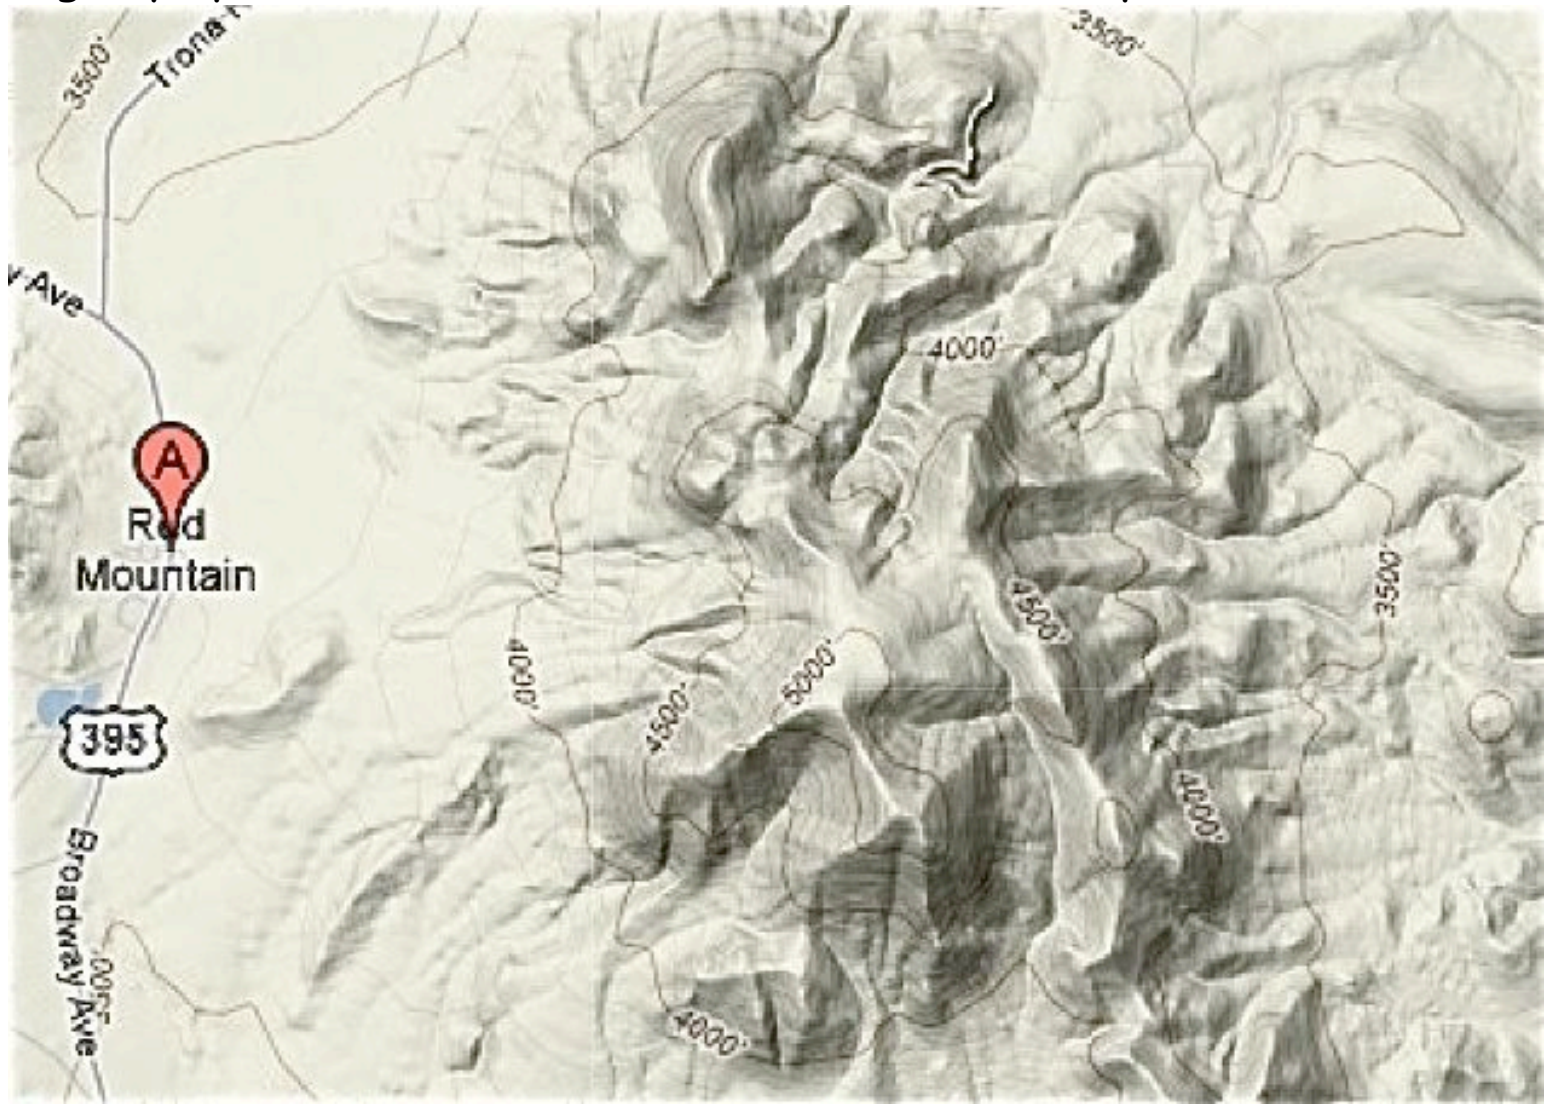

Left-center (above) is (like on Everest) a "saddle" that is a tough climb, but certainly do-able ('cuz I did it)...

I will attempt a summit this coming Spring...

Below, the terrain-map is interesting. The "saddle" right (and slightly up) from the Red Mountain marker in the pic...

...and (I was told) there is the remains of a WWII weather station at the summit. Info (very interesting)...

This map/route should allow me an approach path, and with the right bike (DR-650 with "super knobby" tires) I should have both the power and the traction to make it.

Below: I'm going to show you the mountain, circling to the south...

The twin-peaks of Red Mountain come into view...

Below: I'd assault the peaks from the back-side...

Below: On the way home, I rode up to the base of the saddle...

...and trust me, this area not as easy as it looks :-)

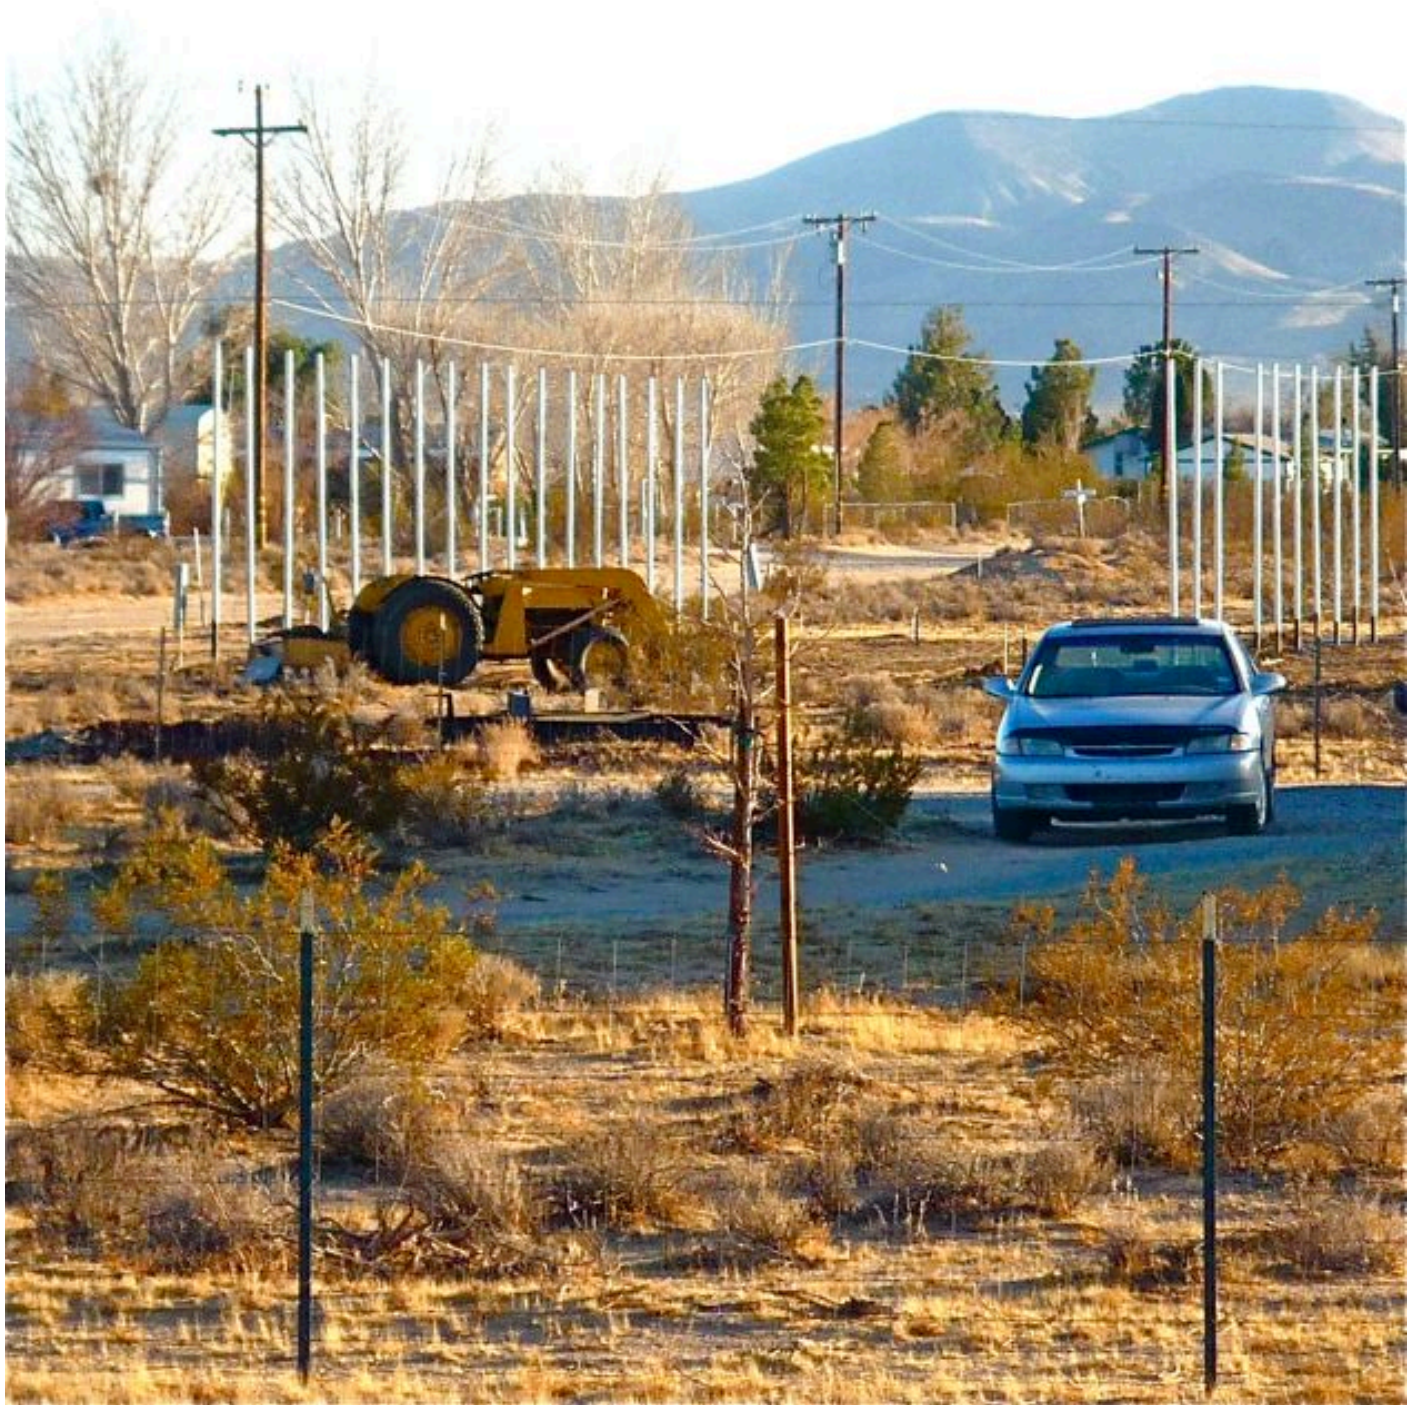

Then, home via the gas-pipeline (striped-marker)...

When I got home, I drove in via my south entrance. Interesting...

What I thought was a house being built, is "something else"...

My property line is the near-view wire fence...

I have no idea what the white-vertical-pipes are for (very close to the road). Stay tuned!

Life here "busy". When things settle down, and I assemble a support-team, I will attempt a solo-summit of Red Mountain :-)

Thanks for reading-along!
